

If the declaration is legal, we might call the function like this

```
calculate("Some string", 123)
```

What we wanted is to use default values for `int a` and `string d`, but since C++ pass arguments by order, the function call will result in `int a` getting a string, `string b` getting an integer, and `int c` getting nothing, which makes the call invalid.